

Excerpted from Chef's Choice: 22 Culinary Masters Tell How Japanese Food Culture Influenced Their Careers and Cuisine by Saori Kawano and Don Gabor
Copyright © 2015 by Saori Kawano (All Rights Reserved)

Table of Contents

Preface by Saori Kawano

Introduction: The Japanese Chef's Way of Thinking xvi

by Toshio Suzuki

- 1. Elizabeth Andoh 2
Author, culinary educator, leading English-language expert on Japanese cuisine, and resident of Japan for more than four decades explains how she first learned about washoku cuisine from the woman who would become her mother-in-law.
- 2. Michael Anthony 16
Executive Chef at Gramercy Tavern, New York City, and winner of the James Beard Foundation's Best Chef in New York City, 2012, talks about his career path from a small Japanese restaurant in Tokyo to Paris and then to Gramercy Tavern.
- 3. David Bouley 32
Executive Owner/Chef of Bouley and Brushstroke, New York City, shares how he and Japanese agricultural experts from Kyoto brought artisanal ingredients to his kaiseki-inspired New York City restaurants.
- 4. Wylie Dufresne 46
Founder of wd~50 and Owner/Chef of Alder in New York City, describes how he and his team use Japanese ingredients in non-traditional Japanese ways.
- 5. Ben Flatt 60
Owner/Chef of Flatt's, a Japanese guesthouse and restaurant on the Noto Peninsula, recalls his culinary journey from Sydney, Australia to Noto and reveals the secrets of traditional Noto cuisine he learned from his Japanese in-laws.

- 6. Eddy Leroux 74
Chef de Cuisine at Daniel, New York City, recounts his career path and how he uses Japanese ingredients in the French kitchen.
- 7. Nobu Matsuhisa 86
Owner/Chef of Nobu, and other restaurants worldwide, shares his story of what inspired him to become a restaurateur.
- 8. David Myers 96
Owner/Chef of restaurants in Southern California and Las Vegas recounts how his first interest in Japan came while working with a Japanese chef at Charlie Trotter's in Chicago and how this experience led to his minimalist approach to dish preparation and menu development.
- 9. Nils Norén 108
VP of Restaurant Operations for the Samuelsson Group and past VP at The French Culinary Institute says that his early discovery of Japanese food introduced him to the mindset that continues to influence his cooking and restaurant operations.
- 10. Ben Pollinger 122
Executive Chef at Oceana, New York City, describes the cooking experiences that took him through various restaurants—both good and bad—to a five-star New York City venue and the challenges he faced along the way.
- 11. Eric Ripert 136
Chef, Co-owner of Le Bernardin explains his career path and how Japanese ingredients and cooking inspire and influence his French cuisine.
- 12. Toni Robertson 152
Executive Chef, Mandarin Oriental Hotel, Singapore, explains how cooking potluck dinners while working in an Air Force emergency room led her to managing restaurant and food services at one of New York and Singapore's top hotels.

13. Michael Romano 172

Chef, Co-owner of Union Square Cafe and past director of culinary services for the Union Square Hospitality Group discloses how his fascination with Japanese cuisine began in a spotless kitchen in Tokyo during an international food competition.

14. Marcus Samuelsson 186

Owner/Chef of the Red Rooster and past Executive Chef of Aquavit recalls how the Japanese chefs he met throughout his career influenced him in adapting Asian cuisine and ingredients.

15. Suvir Saran 196

Chef/past-owner of Dévi, New York City, and Consultant describes his first visit to Japan, the new dishes he had the opportunity to enjoy, and the ways they influenced his style of Indian cooking.

16. Yosuke Suga 208

Past Executive Chef, L'Atelier de Joël Robuchon at the Four Seasons Hotel, New York City, describes how he landed a coveted cook's job in Joël Robuchon's Paris test kitchen.

17. Noriyuki Sugie 220

Past Executive Chef, Asiate, Mandarin Oriental, New York, explains similarities between French and Japanese cuisine and recounts what he learned from masters, such as Chef Yutaka Ishinabe (the "Iron Chef") and Charlie Trotter.

18. Toshio Suzuki 232

Owner/Chef of Sushi Zen, New York City, tells about his philosophical approach to cooking and the challenges he faced when opening his restaurant in New York City.

19. Shinichiro Takagi	242
Owner/Chef of Zeniya in Kanazawa Japan describes his career path from working at Kitcho, where he learned the highest culinary skills from Master Chef Tokuoka, to running one of Kanazawa’s most popular restaurants.
20. James Wierzelewski	256
Past Executive Chef at the New York Marriott Marquis, Harrods in London, and other hotel restaurants describes his philosophy of “eater-tainment” and his quest for unusual Japanese ingredients and cooking methods, which he successfully employs in large venues.
21. Barry Wine	268
Owner/Chef of The Quilted Giraffe shares how he combined Japanese and American food ingredients, exquisite Japanese dishware, and a tasting menu concept to create unforgettable New York dining experiences in the 1980s.
22. Lee Anne Wong	284
Independent chef, consultant, and producer of Top Chef reveals the challenges of her diverse career, from coordinating French Culinary Institute cooking events to reaching the semi-finals on Top Chef .
Glossary of Japanese Ingredients and Terms	300
Selected Cookbooks of Participating Chefs	305
Index	308
About the Authors	317
Additional Resources	319

Photo credit: Monika Sziladi

Excerpted from Chef's Choice: 22 Culinary Masters Tell How Japanese Food Culture Influenced Their Careers and Cuisine by Saori Kawano and Don Gabor
Copyright © 2015 by Saori Kawano (All Rights Reserved)

FOURTEEN

MARCUS SAMUELSSON

Chef/Restaurateur, Founder of Marcus Samuelsson Group

Marcus Samuelsson was born in Ethiopia and was raised by his adoptive parents in Sweden. He studied at the Culinary Institute in Gothenburg, apprenticed in Switzerland and Austria, and came to the U.S. in 1991. At 24, as Executive Chef of Aquavit, he became the youngest chef to receive a three-star restaurant review from The New York Times. In 2003 he was named Best Chef: New York City by the James Beard Foundation and has received numerous other culinary awards.

Marcus Samuelsson is the author of several cookbooks, including, The Soul of a New Cuisine, the winner of the James Beard Foundation's Best International Cookbook. He is a visiting professor at Umeå University School of Restaurant and Culinary Arts in Sweden and is an advisor to the Institute of Culinary Education in New York City. Today Marcus Samuelsson divides his time between his New York City restaurant, Red Rooster Harlem, his non-profit, Careers Through Culinary Arts, and other charities. His latest book, Yes, Chef: A Memoir was published in 2012.

Influences

In terms of cooking, the main language in the kitchen—the only language—is good taste and good food.

When I first started studying cooking in Switzerland, I thought that after I mastered German and French, the rest would be easy. I thought, “Okay, ta-da! I’m learning German now. I’m learning French.” But it didn’t get easier once I mastered the languages. That’s when I realized that language is important. But in terms of cooking, the main language—the only language—is good taste and good food.

Every day our meetings were in German, and the menu was in French. Then I had to communicate back with the guys I worked with in Munich. So it was always this back and forth, back and forth. It was organized chaos, so mistakes happened all the time. And we got yelled at all the time. I think I was cursed at in every language there is—and it always sounded the same. But getting yelled at helped me develop the ability to exchange ideas with people. Now I appreciate all those different curses and insults thrown in my face in all those different languages. I learned that if I wanted to be a chef, I was going to get yelled at a lot.

My goal was not to get yelled at, and then I became the guy who told staff, “Don’t do this or that,” but I didn’t yell.

As a young chef, when my bosses yelled at me, I threw up. I even cried. At that time, I was so young that I didn't really know how to handle it. But the stress always made a big knot in my belly. I would run to the bathroom, throw up, come back out, and work. But I couldn't give up. I was the representative of my family, so it wasn't just about me. No, no. It was also about my mom and my dad and my sister—everyone who helped me get a scholarship to study cooking in Switzerland. That's why, once I got here, I knew that if I got yelled at it didn't matter.

There are some chefs who are natural yellers. Their attitude is, "It doesn't sound like shouting to me. That's just the way I talk." One chef I worked for was like that. He was much older than I was. And he just spoke in one voice—loud! He was screaming all the time. When I came to work, he'd shout, "Good morning!" When he yelled at me to come to his office, I had no idea what would happen. He might say, "I'm sending you ... go now." Or it could be, "You did a good job." Or, "Get the hell out of here." It didn't matter. It was always in the same loud tone. At least he was consistent. He came from a different generation. He had a lot of pressure on him every day and just never let his guard down. But he got everything he wanted. We did everything for him, and he did everything for us. There was never a problem with communication. I still think about him to this day.

There was no way I could quit, so I had to figure out ways to hide from the yelling. I joked, "Choose your torture. Which one do you want—the knife or the words?" My goal was not to get yelled at, and then I became the guy who told staff, "Don't do this or that," but I didn't yell.

I'm not a chef who yells. I don't think it's a sign of strength to be a yeller. I don't like to step out of character. I don't like to get angry. If you're angry when you make a meal or angry when you eat it, the food is not going to taste good. If you're angry, you're not focused. You're hopeless in the kitchen. I'm very demanding, but I think there are other ways to show that I am serious.

Cuisine

Cooking is similar to being a fashion designer—I'm always working one season ahead.

When people come into my restaurant today, I can't stop thinking about what we will be doing six months from now. For example, if it's January and we have a winter menu, I'm thinking about the menu for June or July. A menu takes about six months, from concept to starting point. If I'm working on the menu for late spring or early summer, I am probably thinking about that menu when it is snowing outside.

I spend a lot of time developing new dishes for that menu, too. Let's say you are my special customer. I know you love trout, so I'll get the ocean trout from XYZ and the other ingredients from some other place. I form an intimate relationship with the vendors. If it is January, we'll serve the trout with a seasonal vegetable, for example. But if we don't have seasonal vegetables yet, we will use something else like garlic and whatever else we can substitute. We can add some ingredients, and this fish is going to be beautiful.

For me, judging a dish is very internal. I ask myself, how does it taste? How does it look? I watch how my customers react to a new dish. Sometimes when I am developing a dish, I need to serve it three, four, five, six, seven times. By then I have the size right, I have the cuts right. I've settled on doing it a certain way.

Many of the cooks in New York are from other countries, myself included.

In America, many chefs fresh out of culinary school have a big challenge. If they haven't been raised around food and cooking, they can't say, "I know how to do that." No! To really understand ingredients and know what goes into a dish, they need a lot more experience. That's why I think that a lot of cooks who are immigrants do better in our kitchen. Even if they don't have money to go to culinary school, they were raised around food.

Many of the cooks in New York are from other countries, myself included. We grew up around taste—salt, sweet, sour, bitter. We all have different things in our library of culinary knowledge based on the journey that brought us to America. Here people eat potpies or snacks for dinner, or they go to a Pizza Hut. That kind of eating ruins their sense of taste. And they don't break bread together. Getting together to create a meal where everyone has a role—cooking, setting the table, eating—this has been forgotten. So being a cook is not just about the ingredients. It's not just about the cuisine. It's the whole experience.

Ingredients

If you allow yourself to take the time to learn about the source of your ingredients, you can be a great chef.

I think the most important ingredient is water. As a chef, I rely on clean water every day. In my kitchens, we use water for everything, from mixing it with other ingredients to rinsing produce to washing dishes. In Japan, every chef is trained to pay attention to the water. Every chef needs great water to cook great food. If you allow yourself to take the time to learn about the source of your ingredients, you can be a great chef.

One really useful Japanese ingredient is yuzu, and it's popular for many reasons. Some chefs think it is a combination of lemon and lime, but yuzu is neither. People may think that the tastes are similar, but they aren't. Yuzu works so well in cooking and works so well in flavor tests.

But the Japanese ingredient I like most is smoked fish liver. When I went to the Tsukiji Fish Market in Tokyo, I learned a lot about it. I saw how the Japanese care for and preserve the freshness of their fish. I have never in my life seen so many types of fish. I can't even describe my excitement. I've been to fish markets all over the world, but nothing compared to the Tsukiji Fish Market.

Training

Culinary schools are doing a great job of pushing international cuisine ahead. But they're in a transition.

In the past, culinary schools, such as The French Culinary Institute, the Institute of Culinary Education, and The Culinary Institute of America, have focused primarily on French cooking and Italian cooking. Today's chefs want to learn about other cuisines, too. It sounds like I'm not pro-French. I like French cooking very much, but I think the culinary schools need to be open to other cuisines. Now the cooking schools are beginning to recognize the need to include other cuisines and are adjusting their curriculum.

Right now the cooking schools have another dilemma. How can a new chef who has just paid $70,000 for cooking school tuition afford to take a typical nine-dollar-an-hour restaurant job? I don't know what the solution is, but it's very difficult when you do the math. This brings up the question: Who is the cooking school for? In the past this was never the question, because cooking schools were for those people who wanted to learn how to become cooks or chefs and didn't go to college.

Today, the schools have a more diverse group of students. Now many people are attending cooking school because they want a career change. A potential chef might say, "I was a lawyer, and now I want to try cooking." The guy or gal who didn't go to college can't afford to go to cooking school, so he or she goes directly into a restaurant and learns the basics from the other cooks in the kitchen. This is not a bad or a good thing. It's just a different way of entering the profession.

When students graduate, they are told, "You're just at the beginning, the beginning, the beginning!"

In terms of training curriculum, I think cooking schools do a good job of teaching basic cooking skills. They also provide students with great tools. They have the best kitchens, computers, the best libraries with the latest cookbooks, and excellent teachers. Although American culinary schools are good at training, the fact remains that many students are frustrated because they have paid so much money to go to culinary school. Then when students graduate, they are told, “You’re just at the beginning, the beginning, the beginning!” And it’s true.

For example, the other day I got a phone call from a student and a couple of his friends who wanted to ask me questions about buying a restaurant in their neighborhood. They asked me the type of questions that I would never have asked at their age. But they missed the point about experiencing the journey of becoming an owner/chef. I didn’t even know where to start with them. I was completely baffled, so I couldn’t reply. These young people think, “It’s me, now. Now! Success now!” I don’t believe that young chefs like them will succeed in the restaurant business. However, I’m inside the culinary schools a lot, and I see that they’re making an effort to change that kind of thinking.

Passion is what we’re looking for in the people we hire.

We are very picky about who we hire. How do we choose our people? For me, it’s attitude. Attitude is definitely number one. We are looking for a sense of confidence, but not arrogance. In general, I think women are more confident than men. The guys’ confidence often translates into arrogance. But I think that if you have the confidence and a true passion, if you really want to go somewhere and if you’re humble at the same time, then you can work here. If you’re passionate about food, you can be 15 or 50 years old. Age doesn’t matter.

At the same time, being a chef is very much like being a blues musician. You can be 65 and seem young or 16 and seem old. Success in the kitchen has nothing to do with age or what you can do. The skills can be learned. Skills come with practice and performing the same tasks every day. But today, most young chefs do not come in with a high skill set, because they lack experience. Passion is what we're looking for in the people we hire.

We're essentially looking for an eighteen-month to two-year relationship. Any commitment less than that is not enough. And the most important communication skill for young chefs in the kitchen is a willingness to share. They have to share everything they know. That's why we pick people who are really committed and willing to put in the time. The chefs who stay with us can be very successful. After they have worked with us, they can go to Sweden, they can go to Japan, they can go anywhere they want. They might even move to Daniel or to Jean-Georges afterwards. We see that all the time.

A Day in the Life

“Why did you do that? We've worked all damn day. Why did you throw all the food out?”

When I was in France, some of the best cooks there were Japanese. Actually, they were the older Japanese guys who really loved being in Europe. They knew Japanese food, and they were highly skilled cooks. At one restaurant I worked in, there was a French chef who always paced back and forth in the kitchen. One day, for whatever reason, the French chef threw out all the prep for that day. Afterwards, when we were all in the refrigerator, the Japanese cook asked the worked all damn day. Why did you throw all the food out?”

The French chef answered the Japanese cook by punching him in the belly! But the Japanese cook's stomach muscles were so strong that the French chef just howled because he hurt his hand. I started to laugh, but the Japanese cook never changed his expression and didn't say another word. There was no doubt that the French chef was embarrassed, but so was the Japanese cook because he didn't want to embarrass his boss. I think the French chef almost broke his hand, and all that time I was laughing. We were in the refrigerator, and I knew that I was going to get hit next, and I had no idea what to do. This incident demonstrated where we all were at. In France, I expected this kind of behavior, but the Japanese cook showed the French cook, "You really can't touch me. You're really in shock right now, because you really can't touch me." I don't think I will ever forget that!

Did you enjoy this mini memoir? If so please email us your opinion at don@dongabor.com.

The retail price for Chef's Choice is $19.95.

Korin's discounted price is \$15! Click Here